cover the gap of knowledge to solve this problem and answer questions more efficiently qa robot is designed for this purpose this thesis takes the qa on campus affairs of tamkang university as an example to design a ai qa robot aiming at using ai technology to intelligently help improve the efficiency of campus qa and make campus qa automated and reduce personnel costs the method is to input campus related questions from users and the system will automatically output the answers to the questions there are four main groups on the campus students parents professors and staff they usually have things they want to know about the campus and the pipeline of their aspirations usually needs to contact each place on the campus by phone to get relevant information however there are so many places on the campus that you may not know where to ask specific questions which leads to inefficient problem solving moreover if the questions are too complex and the staff are not experienced enough the user s questions will not be answered it takes a lot of time to answer user s questions such a huge time cost will directly affect the operation of the school and the efficiency of the work everywhere this means school needs to try to effectively reduce the time cost and make accurate answers to users traditional qa robots often encounter some difficulties the traditional way will use the word breaker and extract keywords then output the most probable answer this method is limited to judging only the keywords that exist in the data but not the new words however modern deep learning uses the method of classifying first then comparing word vectors but it is still unable to understand the true meaning of the question as well as the diverse questions corresponding to the users recently due to the maturity of artificial intelligence related technology and the breakthrough of natural language processing this thesis is based on the latest artificial intelligence technology which uses three deep learning neural networks to solve two long standing problems in qa system which is 1 traditionally answers are usually output directly only by comparing user questions to dataset questions without considering that the questions may be from different domain categories resulting to response incorrect answers 2 only by extracting words from user questions that are more likely to be keywords for comparison for the above two fatal questions this thesis implements a campus qa system through multi level detailed processing which is divided into training period and usage period during the training period the existing question and answer sets on the campus are preprocessed after identifying the unequal classification of the problems the data with fewer categories is added to help make the data more balanced by manufacturing extended questions after confirming that the data is balanced use the campus data as input and train the bert classifier to be able to distinguish the range of user problems the classifier can solve the above mentioned problem 1 after that we further trained the bert keyword extraction to find out the user s core intentions finally we trained the bert semantics model to compare the user s question with the most likely question in the campus question and answer set the semantics model can handle the above mentioned question 2 and solved the problem of taking user s question out of context when it gets to using period analyze the user s problem by bert classification bert keyword extraction to narrow down the scope and finally by cosine similarity fuzzy wuzzy comparison and bert semantics model help to discover user s intentions and find answers of it through the way of additional candidate questions it can also output related questions that users want to ask further thus completing campus question and answer in an automated and intelligent way in the experimental phase user s practical questions are used to confirm the responsiveness of the system and compared with traditional methods it is easy to understand the advantages and disadvantages of the system in addition to improve the management of school time costs this system is also helpful for the training of new recruits so that schools can more effectively solve the campus qa business
